When another person causes us distress or difficulty, our first thought is often that the person must be made to change. We may try hard to make the offending person change, but in fact the only person we can change is ourselves.

To free ourselves from the feelings caused by another we first have to acknowledge and examine the feelings the other person produces in us. We must become transparent to ourselves – why does this person make us feel angry, or victimized, or down-trodden or undermined or overwhelmed?

Perhaps the scribes and Pharisees were so hard on the woman because she was like a mirror reflecting their faults back to them. Perhaps the person who causes us anguish is doing something similar, alerting us to psychological vulnerabilities and perhaps even to faults or sins.

Jesus entrusts us, as he did the woman, with the responsibility for changing ourselves. The miracle is that when we do this, the people who bother us seem to change as well.
